Available for Windows now on the App Store, Cardlife: CoAdipogenic potential of bone marrow cells in mice with congenital muscular dystrophy: a rationale for correction of disease. Inflammation and endocrine changes in bone marrow, as manifested in bone, bone marrow and soft tissue inflammation (BMSI), represent a major clinical problem in patients with Duchenne muscular dystrophy (DMD) and can adversely affect the regeneration capacity of skeletal muscle. Myoblasts with characteristics of osteoblast or adipocyte differentiation can be found in human BMSI. However, the cause of increased differentiation of bone marrow cells to adipocyte or osteoblast precursors in BMSI is unknown. In the present study, we evaluated the role of paracrine factors released by fibroblasts from inflamed bone and soft tissue in the differentiation of bone marrow precursors into adipocytes or osteoblast precursors in DMD. Bone marrow mononuclear cells isolated from wild-type mice were cultured in medium in the presence of conditioned medium from fibroblast cultures derived from DMD patients and controls. Adipose tissue-specific triglyceride and adipocyte-specific PPARgamma2 mRNA and protein levels and markers of adipogenesis were examined in this system. Both mononuclear bone marrow cells from DMD patients and controls and bone marrow cells from wild-type mice differentiated into adipocytes in the presence of conditioned medium from DMD and control fibroblasts.
