Since much of what goes into the games is not something you'd see in a gallery or a movie, the quality is very different too. What goes into a game is part art and part program. Most likely, the first draft of any line of code is simply a rough sketch, similar to the first draft of a set of instructions for a graphic designer to follow. Scriptwriters know that a meeting where two artists talk out the themes and visuals of a scene is probably a lot more productive than spending four weeks trying to boil all the lines of code into a single meeting. Above: The settings screens available directly from the app. Below: The 'Sketch' version of the brush, and 'Airbrush' and 'Layer' tool presets, as they appear in the app. Right: The 'Sketch' vector logo created for the Adobe Portfolio app. The entire interface needs to be redesigned, since the Photoshop applications for smartphones has been dated. So, imagine a conventional desktop application, like Adobe Photoshop Lightroom. Put something similar into the spaces on the phone that an image editor needs. For example, a tool for doing adjustments, an image browser, and one that allows you to share what you're doing. For a traditional Photoshop installation, you have access to a huge range of tools: a package where you can do anything you'd need to do using those tools, from a basic color-correcting app to layer editing and tutorials. Like many other photography software applications, Photoshop became the "it" application after it first appeared. Even though people wanted to use some of the offerings of the popular applications, Classic, AI, Encore, etc, they were immediately drawn to Photoshop because it provided true exposure-to-black capabilities on the Web.

The Gradient tool is probably the most useful tool in a designer's bag. It allows you to easily create a gradient or painting transition effect. The most obvious use of the gradient tool is to create a gradient between an object's edges. You can also create radial or directional gradients by drawing lines and connecting them at the ends. The Highlight Shadow/Levels tool is great for finding and isolating one object out of the rest. The tool has two modes: Lighten and Darken, allowing you to compare the shadows against the highlights. Combining it with the Gradient tool allows you to create a gradient between highlighted and shadowed areas. The Perspective Grid is used to correct for perspective when scaling an image. The grid is similar to a paper frame in that you create guides to help you find the correct perspective for your image. The Quick Selection tool allows you to easily make parts of your image visible or invisible by dividing an area into smaller regions. The tool typically starts with a rectangular selection handle, which you can move, resize and divide. When you make a selection, you can also adjust the selection's opacity, fill, blend and mask settings. The Rubber Stamp tool is a great way to create an overlay on top of an image that can be easily edited like a layer. It can be used to create and edit landscape kits, so you can create your own elements that you can either save or make copies of. The Scissors tool is used to crop images by removing parts of them. Use the left mouse button to move the selected area and the right mouse button to change the height and width of the selection handle. Once you are satisfied with the selection, use the keyboard shortcut C to save the selection. e3d0a04c9c

A week ago, I started this new blog for my series The Explosion, which starts this Friday. As a teaser to begin the series, I am starting it off with my new favorite commercial for the first installment of the series. In this commercial, you enter an apartment. There is a car on the street, a couple walking, a guy on a bicycle, and a woman talking on the phone. When the door opens you see just how many people are in the apartment. A month ago, I had a self-imposed deadline to make it to New York City by June. It was a great time for grownup stuff like sleeping and working in an office, but this trip had a bit of a family twist to it. My mom, dad, and my son Max decided to go to New York for a couple of reasons: the sun was about to come back out, Max was getting back into school, and my sister was going to be in town for a long weekend. I have already posted on the reasons why Max's school was coming to an end, but I'm going to skip those for a minute to focus on what they were up to while I was gone. Max's Voice The first week of school went great. I was able to take him for a longer day of speech therapy (which he had been going to a week) and he loved it. He was excited to start school and was at 6th grade page with a plethora of new friends. One of his favorite things to do was play chess at recess. He also said he got no sleep because of the new class schedule at summer school, but I have a feeling that was a bit of an understatement. Max's Voice Let me tell you, you do not want to mess up a kid's week if you know what is good for you (which I think I will forever remember as the Seven-Day Rule). His week started on a Monday, and as a result I had to take an early meeting the next morning. I'll spare you the details of my meeting, but suffice to say that I was extremely fortunate to have the meetings all covered. Max came home from school on Friday night and I played Pokémon Go with him, had dinner, and went to bed on Sunday. Max's Voice Saturday was Max's birthday (yay!), so after we all got dressed for the day, we went out to eat at a pizza place that Max's dad and I had never been to before. When we were inside the restaurant, in walked Nick, a co-worker from a software company that both Nick and I work for. Max was excited and I'm sure Nick was a little-too-obviously thrilled to see his kid. We ate a nice meal, had a cake, and then got a little kayaking.
