While the overall look and design of Photoshop CS6 is indistinguishable from the other versions, many of its key toolbars are nestled so deeply into the interface, they're almost lost. The top two toolbars resemble their counterparts from the other main graphics software applications you use; to find out how they work, you need to dig deeper into their tabs. Adobe wanted to make Photoshop faster, but they make it slower. And they make it even worse. I thought it was going to be hard to use, and it was, but once you know the right shortcuts, it was actually very easy to use. Plus, you'll use the application for a long time, and the shortcuts and features will become second nature.

The image above is from my friend 5-6 year old Desmond who took a photo of me sleeping and uploaded it to Facebook. I asked him what he was thinking about when he was taking the photo. He stated he was thinking about if I would like it. I of course said yes. He then said okay then what he did was he drew a face on me and he was the only one that knew that I would not mind that. It was so cute. He continues to grow up even at that age and is now a huge and talented artist. He likes to draw on everything he sees with his markers that he creates himself. The image above shows my client's hair in place for a new hair style. I created and placed a mock in a place where the client's hair wasn't yet ready due to a shortened schedule. In a matter of a few minutes this mock replaced the real in place hair perfectly. This type of manipulation is called photo retouching. It's the lighting you have to decide first of all then start manipulating the background and hair. It's a great way to become comfortable with more advanced techniques within Photoshop and still create images that are perfect. This image shows my client's face after she applied a cover foundation on her skin. After that she was allowed to go with a new hair style. The key in creating stunning artistic images lies in the perfect balance of the right lighting and shadows. I created this photo in One Hour beauty by getting the lighting just right and using a good cover foundation to match her skin tone.
