I found one way that Photoshop Elements helps me manage my money in interesting light: Every time I pay for a monthly subscription service, I can write down the invoice number and the cost of the service. I just may keep a running tally. (As an alternative, Adobe says I can keep a record of all my annual subscriptions, as well, in the desktop application's Services menu.) That way, I know what I've spent for June, July, August, and so forth. Which poses a conceptual problem, though: Shouldn't the invoice numbers help me keep others straight? Where can I find them? I don't recall seeing the list of subscriptions when I look at my bill every month at the end of the year. (I wish I did, because I can see it as a gift to myself or as a way to get your photo organized for retirement.) I've had to rely on the self-service Help section of the Adobe website, because I don't care what the service is. I can find this out from my bill — which includes a PDF of my annual invoice. I'd like to be able to do it from my desktop application. But I can't find the list of invoices anywhere in the program's menus, nor can I find a way to add them. You can compare your current bill with a previous one. (Help helps: You can click the menu buttons and enter the command Search. Type in an invoice number. Click the Find button in the results. Open the Invoices tab to see if an invoice appears.) I know how to share photos and movies with family and friends. I use File Sharing to easily send an image or video from my laptop to my tablet, smartphone, or the desktop of a family member or a friend. Why do I need to pay for a subscription service to join a network of like-minded individuals—photographers who want to post their photos and share their best shots with the world?

Adobe has reimagined the desktop image editing experience and is leveraging advancements in graphics processing units (GPUs), and using cloud-based file formats. Today's announcement is emblematic of the efforts to move forward and realize the vision Adobe first set out in the original Photoshop CC release in 2015. "As demand for Photoshop on the web grows, we are creating a robust way to intersect with the desktop experience. I met with Adobe at MAX and know that they are listening very closely to what users want and are building a product that will grow with them," said Mark Goldstein, Adobe's Executive Vice President of Creative Cloud. "We made a lot of investment in the performance of the desktop app because the greater value of web-based projects is that they can be shared and shared in a collaborative way, as well as for adapting to content as it changes around the world. One of the big questions for us in regard to the web has always been: What content will work on the web? Today that is answering around the world in a way that's incredibly powerful and manageable," he continued. "We want our users to use Photoshop however they want to use it, whether that's a smart device they carry in their pocket or a desktop computer on their desk. We believe the web and the desktop are two complementary and increasingly integrated experiences.” In addition to the new features introduced today, we have created a new Photoshop app for the web and mobile platforms that enables users to work on surfaces beyond monitors and phones, and share without leaving the interface. New features on the web, such as cross-platform UI parity, open PSD workflows, and new performance and workflow enhancements have been made possible through Adobe Sensei, the AI platform that is enabling democratized access to billions of photos and enable Adobe to build the future.
